Text C is the text from the leaflet 'Mental Health First Aid' offering advice for managing a mental health condition in the workplace.

Text C

Mental Health First Aid

What is mental illness?

While everyone experiences stress, fear, sadness and other negative emotions at times, these feelings usually pass. Mental illness is persistent thought patterns, emotional states, or behaviour which cause distress and impair your ability to live your life and function as you want in social settings, work and relationships. This may be triggered by sudden trauma, like bereavement, or develop over a longer period. Some people make a full recovery from mental health problems. Others experience recurring episodes or will be affected for life.

Common mental health problems include:

- Depression
- Anxiety
- Obsessive Compulsive Disorder (OCD)
- Phobias
- Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD)
- Eating disorders

1 in 4 workers experience mental health problems every year.

Mental Health in the workplace and the law

Having a mental health problem can make your day to day working life challenging, particularly when it comes to social contact. We spend much of our time at work, and depend on our jobs for financial stability. A lack of understanding and support for mental health problems in the workplace, or even discrimination, can compound an employee's illness and render them unable to perform to the required standard or force them out of work all together.

What does the law say?

Most people with ongoing mental health problems meet the definition of disability, as per the Equality Act (2010) and the Disability Discrimination Act (1995). This means that people with mental health problems are legally protected from discrimination and are entitled to reasonable adjustments to help them at work. Employers have a duty to consider these requests and ensure any bullying and discrimination relating to mental health is addressed in the same way as gender, race, etc.

Looking after your mental health

If you are suffering from a mental health problem, there are a number of things you can do to help yourself cope.

1. Talk about your feelings – Talk about your feelings with someone you trust, whether at work or with friends, family or partners.
2. Exercise regularly – This can help you concentrate, sleep, boost your self-esteem and reduce stress.
3. Eat healthy – Eat a healthy diet and try to eat away from your desk. Drink sensibly outside of work.
4. Invest time in relationships – Invest time in relationships with friends and family, even if work is intense.
5. Rest – Taking a proper lunch break can help you manage stress. If you are struggling, consider taking some annual leave if available.
6. Get help – Speak to your GP if you are worried about your mental health. There are also charitable services available.

Supporting Colleagues

Many people are uncomfortable with talking about their mental health at work.

If you suspect someone has a problem, broach the issue privately, and arrange a time and place to talk which is comfortable for them and free of distractions. Make sure you have time to listen. If they are unwilling to talk, don't pressure them, but make it clear you are available if they change their mind.

If someone does confide in you ask how they are doing discretely on a regular basis, and never share what they have told you with others unless they give you permission to do so.

If you are a manager and an employee's behaviour or performance requires disciplinary action or review, be aware that an undisclosed mental health problem could be a factor. If you believe this may be the case, broach the subject and have an honest, open conversation about it.

sounds like the dark part of a quest in which there is a betrayal and desperate actions due to the conflict between an inner yearning for something and duty/obligation to another, with underlying tones of a power struggle and desire for more.

Translation: it sounds alluring and darkly good.
