Section A

Answer Question 01.

Extract A

The actions of the Fenians in 1867 caused many Liberals to wonder if the time had come to steer Ireland away from acts of desperation through a sustained attempt at constructive reform. One of the people who began to think this way was Gladstone. After 1868, Gladstone's Irish legislation signalled a fresh way of looking at Irish problems. It marked a new harmony between English Liberalism and Irish Catholicism. In particular, the 1881 Land Act did much to meet the immediate demands of Irish tenants. It established the principle of co-partnership in the soil between landlord and tenant. It did this by giving the tenant the famous 'three Fs' – fair rents, fixity of tenure and free sale. 5

Extract B

In 1870, Gladstone guided his first Irish Land Act through parliament. However, the act was not especially bold and it proved disappointing in operation. Subsequently, the agricultural depression of the 1870s gave a new intensity to the Irish question. Irish tenants could not pay their rents. Evictions resulted; but evictions led to attempts on the lives of landlords and agents. Gladstone felt bound to restore law and order and a Coercion Act was passed in 1881. At the same time, Gladstone accepted the need for a second Irish Land Act. However, this Act was a concession which Parnell and the Land League did not think went far enough. Once again, the Liberal government was satisfying no-one. 5
