Section A

Answer Question 01.

Extract A

Bismarck would have found it impossible to rule without the consent of the people via their representatives in the Reichstag. In his role as chancellor, it was Bismarck's task to control the Reichstag. Constitutionally unable to initiate legislation, the Reichstag nevertheless had the right to block the draft laws it was presented with and did so often. Therefore, Bismarck had to work hard to convince the 394 representatives to go along with his plans. Bismarck had created a system where laws could only be passed with the approval of the representatives of the German people. The period was, therefore, dominated as much by liberalism and democratic thought as it was by nationalism and authoritarianism. 5

Extract B

Imperial Germany could not be classed as a democratic state. The elected majority did not have the last word in the government. The contrast between the appearance of democracy and the reality of autocracy arose from the dominance of Prussia within the Empire. The position of Prussia in the constitution gave its rulers an effective veto on change in the federal structure. The appearance of constitutional government was a false impression because social and political life were based on institutions and attitudes suited to an autocratic government. For example, the chancellor and ministers were not responsible to the Reichstag but to the emperor. True parliamentary government was impossible. 5
