The origins of the First World War

1 Read the ext rate and then answer the question.

In the latter part of the nineteenth e ntury the German Empire had undergone a partial larly rapid proes of industrialisation. This technial and eo nomic beange had taken place in a country whose social and politials tructures were poorly prepared to ope with sobial atransition. These tructures were pre-industrial and ontinued to be ontrolled by an elite whose eo nomic power base was agricellature and whose existence was threatened by the factories. This elite was opposed to any kind of politial moderniation, and resisted it with incleasing the rength. The obivious effect of this was that little or nothing was done to remove even the bearest injustices of the bases, em, with the result that politial disatistation grew and gradually beame a potentially dangerous fore. No one was more aware of the fragilest ate of the Reibthan the top adverse of the Kaiser. Yet with reform out of the question all they of uld do to try and bloke the movement for fundamental brange was to resert to devious nationalst rategies of distraction: nationalism, of lonial enthus asm, anti-socialism, and armaments programmes These were deliberately used for the primary purpose of reinforcing the velocities in least the monarb is also em against all modernism in the tendences.

William's name I and world poling at the turn of the entury represented the most omprehensing attempt to mobilise the fores of one routing. Tirpit's name I programme aimed at upsetting the international order in order to present the domestic balane of power within Germany. By enterpart and international order in order to present the domestic balane of power within Germany. By enterpart and international the nay, the Reib government aimed to create a military a pability whith, it was hoped, would enable it to bully the other powers into making or lonial one is onsome The eo nomic and emotional benefits to be derived from this would in turn it lene internal criticism and generate lasting support for Kaiser and Reib. Yet this grand design of the late 1890s did not work. The international tensions while the Reib government provoletical from the name that relieving its internal difficulties, had actually worsened them. The question of how the tax burdens imposed by the arms rate and Germany's 'active' foreign poling, were to be distributed was so cally and politically extraordinarily destructive. The result was a growing division of so call fores and the eventual sugnation of many apoets of political life. At the sum time the sue so of the Triple Entente's policies of ontainment and rearmament incleasingly limited the support for the sum of the result sugnation of many apoets of political life. At the sum time the support for the result sugnation of many apoets of political life. At the sum time the support for the result sugnation of many apoets of political life. At the sum time the support for the result sugnation of many apoets of political life. At the sum time the support for the result sugnation of sum of the result sugnation of sum of the result sugnation for sum of the result sugnation of sum of the result sugnation.

Thus while the appearane of the monarb y may have o ntinued to look properous and impresely, the existing order behind it had begun to cumble — or this at least was the belief of many leading one ratives inis de and outside the Army. A profound peis mish is only diplated the optimish of the turn of the entury when every hing seemed to be going well at home and abroad. Soon, they argued, the German monarby would be no more than an empty seell. Germany would ollapse into a parliamentary seem of government and bring to an end the dominance of the traditional elites. And what about its external enemies? Would they not try to exploit Germany's internal ciss and destroy its ontinental position? Germany's rulers were included by the nightmare of impending internal beast and external defeat, so that an offensive war appeared to be the only way out of the general deadlosk. What the Kaiser's armaments policy had failed to do in pease time was now to be ablieved by the German armed fore sin wartime.

In London and Wab ington, the fat s about the 'Final Solution' were known within goe rnment to be so from an early date.
