Sources for use with Section A.

Source 1: From Fan Cao, Under the Red Sun, published 2005. Fan Cao was a teenager during the Cultural Revolution. Here, in her memoir, she recalls her actions in 1968 during the Cultural Revolution.

I was in the 7th grade at school when the Great Cultural Revolution started. Growing up in the 'New China', we were brought up with revolutionary ideas. How glorious we children felt to have the great destiny of liberating all humanity!

I was not allowed to join the Red Guards because my parents were university teachers, which automatically made them suspect as anti-revolutionists. I became a target of the revolution. I lost all my friends and lived in constant fear for several years. 5

Despite this unbearable life, I did not question my belief in the revolution. Instead, I wondered if my parents might have done something wrong. I wrote a big character poster denouncing them to show my loyalty to Mao. My childish action deeply hurt my relationship with my parents. As I grew up, I slowly learned the truth behind the so-called 'revolution'. I also realised that my family and I were relatively lucky compared with thousands of innocent people who died in the endless political movements. 10

I am very remorseful, and I still feel shaken as I think back on what happened during the Cultural Revolution. 15

Source 2: From Henry Kissinger, On China, published 2011. Kissinger was the US National Security Adviser and Secretary of State during the years 1969–77. He visited China in 1971 and met leading members of China's government, including Mao. Here he is commenting on the Great Leap Forward, which began in 1958.

The Great Leap Forward was designed to carry out Mao's wide-ranging ideas of industrial and agricultural development. Much of China's remaining private property and profit incentives were eliminated as the country was reorganised into 'people's communes'. Peasants were conscripted into military-style brigades for massive public works projects. 20

These projects had international as well as domestic implications. If successful, the Great Leap Forward would effectively make China the ideological centre of the Communist world. When the Soviet leader Khrushchev visited Beijing in 1958, Mao insisted that China would achieve full Communism before the Soviet Union. 25

But Mao had set an unrealistic challenge. The Great Leap Forward's production goals were excessive. The prospect of failing to meet the targets was so terrifying that local cadres falsified their figures and reported inflated totals. Therefore, Mao's government wrongly believed it could continue to export grain to the Soviet Union in exchange for heavy industry and weaponry. The disaster was intensified by Mao's steel targets, which had encouraged the melting down of useful implements as scrap to fulfil the quotas. 30

In the end, the outcome of the Great Leap Forward was brutal. From 1959 to 1962, China experienced one of the worst famines in human history, leading to the deaths of over twenty million people. 35
