Sources for use with Section A.

Source 1: From Lionel Max Chassin, The Communist Conquest of China, published 1952. Chassin was a general in the French Air Force in Indo-China in the late 1940s. He wrote his account of the civil war based upon French intelligence reports gathered in China.

At the start of the civil war, Mao's chances of success were very limited. He dominated only a small territory; he had no money, no resources and no allies. He was clearly inferior to Chiang Kai-shek in numbers and resources. Worst of all, the leaders of Communist Russia had abandoned him; they had recognised Chiang Kai-shek, Mao's mortal enemy, as the leader of China.

5

However, four years later, Chiang Kai-shek was a defeated refugee on the small island of Taiwan, while Mao had set himself up in Beijing as the master of 480 million human beings. What had happened?

The great lesson of the Chinese Civil War is this: Determination is always important in achieving victory, and it is morale that wins battles.

10

Mao only needed to focus on very familiar ideas. He encouraged nationalism and the hatred of foreigners. He focused on the struggle against foreign imperialists, who, he claimed, had 'enslaved' the superior civilisation of China. Within China, Mao cleverly appealed to the desires for social justice, which are so strong in the human heart.

15

Source 2: From a Communist Party handbook issued in 1964. The handbook was used by Communist Party cadres to advise young people on love and marriage. Here it gives advice on choosing a partner.

Some young people are introduced to their partners by family and relatives. Is this way of doing things good? It is better for young men and women to find their beloveds by themselves and to build up a love relationship through common labour and common struggle.

May young men and women date each other in public? Of course, they may. So-called friends ought to be comrades in our socialist society. This sort of comradely relationship is beneficial to building socialism and, at the same time, it makes our lives happier and more joyful. Under such circumstances, why shouldn't young men and women date each other publicly?

20

We must clear away the remains of old-fashioned ideology in our minds and treat the relationship between the sexes correctly. If you love another person, you must give it serious consideration. After due consideration, if you want to propose, then propose. You need not resist these feelings and create suffering.

25

When they fall in love, young men and women must be particularly careful to balance the relationship between love and work.

30

In falling in love, one should never have improper sexual relationships as a result of temporary emotional impulses. This is immoral.
