Sources for use with Section A.

Source 1: From a despatch written by Sir Douglas Haig, 23 December 1916. Haig was reporting back to the British government on the military events of 1916.

A bombardment started at dawn on 12 September and continued steadily and uninterruptedly till the moment of attack. At dawn on 15 September, the infantry assault commenced and, at the same moment, the bombardment became intense. Our new heavily-armoured cars, known as 'tanks', which were now brought into action for the first time, successfully co-operated with the infantry. The 'tanks', coming as a surprise to the enemy soldiers, gave valuable help in breaking down their resistance. 5

The advance was successful on almost the whole of the front where 'tanks' were used. After just two hours, 'tanks' were seen to be entering the village of Flers, followed by large numbers of troops. Fighting continued in Flers for some time, but our troops quite quickly reached the north side of the village. By midday, they had occupied the enemy's trenches for some distance beyond the village. 10

The result of this fighting was a more considerable gain than any which we had achieved in the course of a single operation since the beginning of the Somme offensive. In the course of one day's fighting, we had broken through two of the enemy's main defensive systems and had advanced on a front of over six miles. 15

I have already brought to your notice the part played by the new 'tanks' in some of my daily reports. These 'tanks' proved of great value on various occasions in later fights, and the personnel in charge of them performed many deeds of remarkable valour. 20

Source 2: From a letter by Charles Rigg published in the Evening Times newspaper, 14 November 1934. Rigg had served in the 1st Brigade of the Tanks Corps during the major battles of 1917.

Tanks were the greatest invention of the war. They were designed to save the lives of the infantry by leading the attacks on entrenched and fortified positions by breaking the enemy's wire. However, surprise was to be the essential feature of the tank attack. No preliminary artillery bombardment was required or wanted, as this would only advertise the attack. 25

Tanks were never used in the intended manner until the battle of Cambrai in November 1917, fourteen months after their introduction. Then, their success was so startling and overwhelming that British and German General Staffs alike were completely surprised. Eventually, we did not achieve a great victory at Cambrai, because our General Staff had not organised for a continuance of the 'push' after the 'break-through' and had no reserves available. 30

Earlier in the year, on the Passchendaele front the Tanks Corps was first used in July 1917. There they were used after three weeks of the most intense bombardment, which just advertised the attack. The condition of the ground after this bombardment was terrible and a sea of mud. Over this ground, the tanks were asked, impossibly, to trundle their 40-ton weights. Irritatingly tanks became frequently stuck, which left them as easy targets for the German artillery. This also held up attacks through time lost in recovering them. Tanks failed to give the infantry the expected support, not through lack of skill or determination, but because the ground was better for submarines than tanks. Only once in that dreadful three months' long battle, were the tanks allowed to attack in the proper manner and then every objective was taken just as planned. 40 45
