Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From M Price, Napoleon: The End of Glory, published in 2014.

Napoleon is an excellent example of the fact that the actions of individual rulers are vital to maintaining authoritarian regimes such as the Napoleonic Empire. Napoleon's own decisions played a crucial part in his overthrow. Nowhere is this clearer than in his refusal to make a compromise peace after the Russian disaster. Had he compromised Napoleon could have kept France's 'natural frontiers', and probably also its domination of Italy. His refusal led to the failure at Leipzig, and the loss of all of his empire beyond the Rhine. 5

Later, even when France's 'natural frontiers' had been invaded, Napoleon rejected the offer of a return to France's pre-revolutionary borders. On the ship into exile in 1814, his companions confessed their astonishment at this stubbornness. Napoleon replied that he had promised to maintain France as it was when he became Emperor and so could not agree to it becoming smaller. 10

Napoleon believed that making peace on the terms offered would incite the French people to rise up against him. He was catastrophically wrong, and his mistake had terrible consequences in 1813–14. His advisers desperately tried to change his mind, but he would not listen. Napoleon would not, or could not take their advice, and fought on recklessly to the end. 15

Extract 2: From D G Wright, Napoleon and Europe, published in 1984.

During 1813, Napoleon began to find himself surrounded by enemies and at a growing disadvantage in the number of available soldiers. The alliance of Russia and Prussia was strengthened by Napoleon's unwillingness to accept a peace settlement. The British put pressure on the European monarchs to ally against the French by offering substantial subsidies. Sweden joined the allies in return for a British subsidy. Metternich was persuaded to overcome his concerns and, in August, Austria at last joined the alliance against the French. 20

It had always been probable that, if the European great powers got rid of their differences and stayed together, Napoleon would be finished. Until now he had always been able to knock at least one country out of any coalition against him, but this was now very unlikely. Russia and Prussia agreed not to make a separate peace, the allies were encouraged by the obvious decline in French military effectiveness and Wellington appeared victorious in Spain. The allies had at least 800,000 men available, with plentiful reserves, against Napoleon's 700,000, which included a high proportion of untrained recruits. After the stunning defeat of France at Leipzig in October, the only hope for Napoleon was that Austria, Prussia and Russia would quarrel and undermine their own alliance. However, intense British diplomatic activity resulted in the allies resolving to continue the war. Napoleon was doomed. 25 30 35
