Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From G P Gooch, Before the War: Studies in Diplomacy. Volume II, The Coming of the Storm, published in 1938.

The Sarajevo murders of June 28 convinced Austria of the necessity to threaten Serbia militarily, if the agreement of Germany could be obtained. In the words of the Austrian Chief of Staff it was Serbia's declaration of war and could be responded to only by war. The Austrian diplomatic successes of 1909 and 1913 in the Balkans had enhanced Austria's prestige for only a short time. Indeed, ultimately, they had made relations with Serbia worse. 5

The time for reconciliation had passed. Austria's uncompromising attitude after Sarajevo, which surprised and shocked the world, can only be understood in relation to its experiences and emotions since 1908. At the close of the Bosnian crisis in 1909, Serbia had promised to be a good neighbour, but it had not kept its word and had established a friendly relationship with Russia. By 1914, Serbia had been boosted by its recent victory over the Turks and Bulgars and encouraged by promises of Russian support. Austria believed that Serbia would not remain content with the frontiers agreed in 1913. For Austria to do nothing now would suggest that Austria was powerless. Doing nothing might encourage an attack when Austria's enemies finally felt strong enough to ally together. Austria did not want to wait. The carefully organised murder of the heir to the throne appeared to demand some striking assertion of Austrian power. 10 15

Extract 2: From L C F Turner, Origins of the First World War, published in 1970.

All military thinking in Europe was dominated by the implications of the German Schlieffen Plan. The French and Russian generals were well aware of the outline of the plan, and their own plans were aimed at disrupting it by aggressive offensives of their own. The French were convinced that they could win a great battle in eastern France and be able to cut off a German circling move through Belgium. The Franco-Russian military conference in August 1913 confirmed the opinion expressed every year since 1910, that 'Germany will direct the greatest part of her forces against France and leave only a minimum of troops against Russia.' This meant that Russia should launch a major offensive against Germany as soon as possible after the fifteenth day of mobilisation. The Russians gave categorical assurances to the French that Russia would invade East Prussia as rapidly as possible.

The application of the Schlieffen Plan would automatically have led to intense activity in eastern Europe. Russia would have to mobilise rapidly and invade Germany to relieve pressure on France. Austria would have to launch a massive invasion of southern Poland to tie down the principal Russian forces and prevent them destroying the German forces in East Prussia. The urgent need of both France and Germany for rapid mobilisation and early offensive action by their eastern allies accelerated the whole tempo of the crisis of July 1914.
