Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From N Stone, World War One: A Short History, published 2008.

The arms race began speeding up across Europe from 1911: a 'super-Dreadnought' battleship was in the planning, more soldiers were being conscripted, more strategic railways being built. There was a great expansion in trade, and governments had money to spend. A small increase in German army spending (to train more men) in 1911 provoked a French response (again, more men in a peacetime army) in 1912. This, in turn, provoked another German (and Austrian) increase. In 1913–14, came a decisive move from Russia: 'a great programme' that was intended to turn Russia into a 'super-power'. It was designed to give Russia more guns than Germany by 1917 and, at last, allow the Russian army to feed, clothe and transport all its conscripted men. 5 10

In Germany, there was panic amongst the government and the military generals. The planned increase in the Russian army's size and power was bad enough but what caused real panic was the intended growth of Russia's railways. Germany knew that Austria-Hungary, its only real ally, would soon disintegrate. The German army had been saying for some time that it could win a European war then and there. This would not be manageable if Russia's military programme was successful. In 1914, Berlin was waiting for an opportunity – an 'inevitable accident' – and this came with the assassination of the Archduke in Sarajevo. 15

Extract 2: From P Bell, Origins of War, published in 1992.

When looking for the reasons for why war broke out in Europe in July–August 1914, then the apparently powerful explanation that European arms races were responsible seems much less convincing under close examination. It is true that the German and French armies were built up in competition with one another and so were the German and British naval fleets. However, the war of 1914 did not emerge directly out of Franco-German conflict, and Anglo-German conflict came very late in the crisis of 1914. The actual conflict was between Austria-Hungary and Russia, neither of which had been engaged in an arms race with one another. 20 25

It was not the general issue of arms races that contributed directly to the course of events in July and August, but it was the detailed strategic planning for the use of those armaments, especially on land. The role of the Schlieffen Plan in the event of Germany going to war with Russia was crucial. As soon as the state of an 'imminent danger of war' was declared in Germany, then the plans for mobilisation moved with a momentum which could not be stopped. The German mobilisation was also a plan for starting a war. The two were inseparable, mobilisation became war. 30 35
