Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From R B Levering, The Cold War: A Post-Cold War History, published in 1994.

Post-1945, relations between the USA and the Soviet Union were harmed by developments in propaganda on both sides. Within a year of the Second World War ending, the Americans and the Russians saw each other in exactly the same way, as being threatening and expansionist and pushing the world towards a new war. 5

Many Americans believed that Stalin was another Hitler determined on world domination and a ruthless dictator likely to take advantage of any attempts at compromise. Thousands of people who influenced public opinion in America, in journalism, politics, business and religion also thought so. Americans also viewed the United States as having special qualities that made it superior to other nations. They believed that American involvement in the Second World War had shown America as the hope of the world, with its selfless commitment to peace, justice and prosperity. Western Europe cautiously accepted this proposition, the Russians did not. 10

The Russians believed that they were the only power that could secure the world from the threat of capitalism and imperialism. In increasingly hostile official statements in leading newspapers and elsewhere, the Russians declared the superiority of their own political system, and its eventual triumph over corrupt capitalism. They also stated that the West was preparing to destroy the Soviet way of life. But it was Soviet malicious disinformation, frequent rudeness and deviousness in diplomatic gatherings and highly publicised spying in the West that actually seemed to inspire anti-Russian feeling. 20

Extract 2: From A J P Taylor, The Cold War, published in 1995.

The Cold War was deliberately started by Truman in 1945. Roosevelt was a man of world vision who had looked to delay any final settlements with Russia until the Allied victory. Truman saw things differently. He had an anti-Soviet past and anti-Soviet advisers. Truman also had narrow-minded impatience with anyone who failed to acknowledge American power. Russian insistence on equality with the USA made Truman want a showdown almost immediately he became President. 25

Truman had thought the showdown with Stalin would come at the Potsdam Conference, but Potsdam came too soon for Truman to assure success. Truman made the tactical decision to postpone the confrontation until the atom bomb was dropped. Truman thought that he would soon hold all the power. However, all that a Cold War-focused Truman achieved was to ensure that Soviet policy also became Cold War focused. 30 35

The Cold War was intentionally provoked. It was intended to be short-lived. Truman and his accomplices calculated that Soviet Russia would run away once the bomb had gone off. They underestimated Soviet stubbornness. They also misjudged the impact of the bomb on the Soviets. The Americans intended to terrify the Russians. When the Russians refused to be terrified, the Americans had to make out that they themselves were terrified in order to push up the levels of alarm. 40
