Extracts for use with SECTION A.

Extract 1: From E Foner, The Story of American Freedom, published in 1998.

The Truman Doctrine created the language through which most Americans came to understand the post-war world. It involved a vision of America's mission as defending liberty against the forces of darkness. More than any other statement, Senator Fulbright later wrote, the Truman Doctrine established 'the guiding spirit of American foreign policy.' As the Cold War intensified in the next few years, with the Berlin blockade, a Communist government in China, the establishment of NATO, and the Korean War, so did the rhetoric. Life magazine declared in 1950, the aim of the Soviet Union was 'slavery for all the world, including the people of the United States.' In that year, another influential Cold War document NSC 68, issued a call for a permanent military build-up to enable the United States to engage in a global crusade against communism. Drafted for the National Security Council, NSC 68 described the Cold War as a conflict between 'the idea of freedom' and the 'idea of slavery under the grim control of the Kremlin.' This rhetoric established the framework within which Truman understood his presidency. 'I have hardly had a day in office,' he observed on retiring in 1953, 'that has not been dominated by this all-embracing struggle between those who love freedom and those who wanted to lead the world back into slavery and darkness.'

Extract 2: From J and G Kolko, American Capitalist Expansion, published in 1999.

Surrounded by vast post-war upheaval, the United States found itself immeasurably enriched and, without rival, the strongest nation on the globe. It emerged from the war self-conscious of its new strength and confident of its ability to direct world reconstruction along lines compatible with its goals. And these objectives, carefully formulated during the war, were deceptively simple: Essentially, the United States' aim was to restructure the world so that American business could trade, operate, and profit without restrictions everywhere. On this there was absolute unanimity amongst the American leaders, and it was around these core objectives that they elaborated their policies and programs.

The United States' ultimate objective at the end of World War II was both to sustain and to reform world capitalism.

From the outset, Washington set the entire question of post-war American aid and foreign economic policy in the context that 'our objective has as its background the needs and interests of the people of the United States.'

The question of foreign economic policy was not the containment of communism, but rather more directly the extension and expansion of American capitalism according to its new economic power and needs.
