Extracts for use with Section C.

Extract 1: From Thomas F. Madden, Outside and Inside the Fourth Crusade, published 1995.

If Venice should be blamed for the diversion of the Fourth Crusade to Constantinople, then particular blame should be given to doge Enrico Dandolo. The personality of the doge is important. He was a man whose cool assessment of the situation meant that he was indifferent to the passions of the crusaders. He was completely unmoved by the genuine crusading spirit. Dandolo realised that the permanent security of Venetian interests in the East could only be obtained by destroying the Byzantine Empire. 5

When the glory and benefit of Venice demanded it, Dandolo had no scruples about how it might be achieved. He knew how to get people to do what he wanted and he possessed extraordinary willpower. Dandolo had many qualities. He was a remarkable statesman, an ingenious diplomat and an expert economist. In his mind, the chances of securing the Byzantine market for Venice was a chance to be taken. 10

Extract 2: From Jonathan Harris, The Debate on the Fourth Crusade, published 2004.

The Fourth Crusade can be seen as a series of unfortunate accidents. Far from being a villain, Dandolo was a wise and able man. If anyone should be blamed for the failure of the Fourth Crusade it was those crusaders who failed to show up at Venice in the summer of 1202 and who failed to pay their passage money to the Venetians. They left the expedition hopelessly under-financed. This gave the crusader leaders little choice when the Byzantine prince, Alexius Angelos, invited them to accompany him to Constantinople to help restore his father, the emperor Isaac II, to his rightful throne. For Alexius promised to pay all the expenses of the expedition. 15 20

Once Isaac and Alexius were placed back on the throne by the crusaders in August 1203, however, they proved slow in paying their debts to the crusaders. When, in January 1204, a new and uncooperative emperor, Alexios Mourtzouphlos, seized power, the crusaders had no choice but to attack. 25
