Extracts for use with Section C.

Extract 1: From T. A. Morris, Tudor Government, published 1999.

The government used a range of methods to deal with socio-economic problems in the localities. The Council circulated Books of Orders to JPs, with instructions relating to plague conditions and to harvest failure and grain shortages, which were widely obeyed. Tudor social legislation could not possibly have solved the problems that English society experienced in the 1590s, but it may have helped to maintain stability; in many cases matters would have been worse without the legislation. It also helped to convince the 'victims' of economic depression that the government was on their side. Such legislation was a joint effort. It is increasingly accepted that the effort was an impressive one. 5

Thus there was a broad community of interest. There were genuine instances of tension between the Queen and her Parliaments. However, the major confrontation over monopolies, which is now primarily interpreted as an expression of concern at damage done to the financial interests of many MPs, was successfully dealt with. 10

Extract 2: From John Guy, The Tudor Age, published 1992.

The strain of a war economy was cumulative: 105,800 men were conscripted during the last eighteen years of the reign. Pressure on the counties led to administrative breakdowns and opposition to central government's demands. In addition, disruption of trade, outbreaks of plague, ruined harvests in 1596 and 1597, and acute economic depression caused widespread resentment. 20

Where late Elizabethan government aroused more vocal dissent was in the matters of licences and monopolies. Clashes in 1597 and 1601 were the ugliest in Parliament during the Tudor period. They signalled unmistakable resentment of abuses from which courtiers and government officials gained. Elizabeth had personally to intervene to neutralise the attack, and in 1601 she averted the crisis only at the expense of the monopoly holders. 25

The final criticism levelled against late Elizabethan government is that the benefits of the Poor Laws were overwhelmed by the economic distress of the 1590s. Perhaps two-fifths of the population fell below the level of subsistence, with starvation in the uplands of Cumbria. Disease spread unchecked; reported crimes against property increased; and thousands of families were thrown on to parish relief. 30
