Sources for use with Section A.

Answer the questions in Section A on the option for which you have been prepared.

Option 2A.1: Anglo-Saxon England and the Anglo-Norman Kingdom, c1053–1106

Source for use with Question 1(a).

Source 1: From a law applied during the reign of Henry I concerning the crime of murdrum. Murdrum was the crime of killing an unknown man. It was an English law that had first been introduced by the Danes.

If any Frenchman, or any Norman or lastly any man from beyond the sea, is killed and it is considered that the dead man has been murdered, the killer must be handed over to the king's justice within seven days of the crime. If it is murder by an unknown killer, a fine of 46 marks of silver shall be paid by the hundred. The king shall be paid 40 marks and 6 marks paid to the relatives of the slain man. 5

The death of an Englishman is not regarded or paid for as murder, but only the death of a Frenchman. If no one can prove that the slain man is English, he is considered to be French. If the hundred wishes to prove that he is not a Frenchman and that therefore there is no murder, twelve good men from the same hundred must swear an oath to that effect. 10

Source for use with Question 1(b).

Source 2: From William of Poitiers, The Deeds of William, Duke of the Normans and King of the English, published c1073. William of Poitiers was a soldier and chaplain to Duke William. He was not present at the Battle of Hastings but was well-placed to receive details of the battle from those who fought in it. Here he is commenting on events in the Battle of Hastings.

William was a noble general, inspiring courage, sharing danger, more often commanding men from the front than urging them from the rear. He led them by his valour and gave them courage. The enemy lost heart at the mere sight of this marvellous and terrifying knight. Even after the loss of his horse, one could see his skill and be impressed by the strength of his arm and the greatness of his spirit. Shields and helmets were cut by his furious and flashing blade, while yet other assailants were struck by his own shield. His knights were astonished to see him fighting on foot, and many of the wounded were given new heart. 15

The English saw that they could not hold out much longer against the Normans. They knew they had lost a great part of their army, and that many of their greatest men had fallen. Dismayed at the merciless behaviour of the Duke, who spared none who came against him and whose skill could not rest until victory was won, they began to flee as swiftly as they could. 20

Option 2A.2: England and the Angevin Empire in the reign of Henry II, 1154–89

Source for use with Question 2(a).

Source 3: From William Fitzstephen, The Life of St Thomas, written in the 1170s. Fitzstephen was Becket's household clerk. Here Fitzstephen is quoting Becket's words to Henry II when Becket met with Henry in July 1170.

I am indebted and accountable to you as my king and worldly lord, especially now when you have just recalled and admitted me to your peace and favour. But among all the individual evils which in your anger and resentment I have endured – exclusion, plunder, my banishment and that of my people and whatever oppressions of the church of Canterbury – there is one that disturbs me most. I cannot leave this evil untouched or uncorrected. You had your son crowned by the Archbishop of York in the province of Canterbury. You have taken from the church of Canterbury, the church which anointed you as king with holy oils, its privilege of consecrating kings. This, among all its privileges, Canterbury has regarded as its own and special privilege ever since the See of Canterbury was established.

Source for use with Question 2(b).

Source 4: From The Annals of Roger of Howden. Roger of Howden was an English clergyman who served Henry II after 1174 as a negotiator in France and Ireland. Here he is writing about negotiations between Henry II and Louis VII of France in 1161.

In the year of 1161, King Henry and King Louis of France disagreed over the divisions of their territories, and the castles of Gisors and Neafle in Normandy, which at that time were in the hands of King Louis. King Henry claimed them as rightfully belonging to his dukedom of Normandy. The kings came to these terms:

The king of France should give his two daughters, Margaret and Alice, in marriage to the two sons of King Henry, namely, Henry and Richard, who were then little children.

King Louis should place the castles into the care of the Templars for safe custody, until his daughters were married to the sons of King Henry.

After the marriage of Margaret and Young Henry, both castles should be handed over to King Henry.

After these terms were agreed and confirmed by oaths, King Louis handed over both of his daughters to King Henry, and the castles into the custody of the Templars. Then King Henry married his son to Margaret. The Templars immediately handed over the castles to King Henry. In consequence, King Louis was extremely angry, and banished these Templars from his kingdom. King Henry welcomed these Templars and rewarded them with many honours.
