Explain which you think is more convincing as an explanation of the nature and extent of Philip II's support for the Spanish Inquisition. [30]

Passage A

The most pressing of Philip's problems with the Church on his return to Spain in 1559 was to regain control over the Inquisition and to direct it for his own purposes. He signalled his support of the Inquisition by following up his attendance at the auto-da-fe* in Valladolid in 1559 by being present at autos in Toledo (1560) and in Barcelona (1563). He also allowed the Inquisition to exercise some new powers. In 1559, for instance, he ordered that all Spanish students at Louvain University in the Low Countries were to return home and submit themselves to vetting by the Inquisition. He forbade Spaniards to study at foreign universities. More drastically still, he allowed Fernando de Valdes (Inquisitor-General) to issue the Index of August 1559.

However, once Philip had succeeded in removing Valdes in 1565 (on grounds of old age and ill health) he deliberately changed the nature of the Inquisition by appointing Diego de Espinosa as the first of a succession of Inquisitors-General of whose loyalty he could be absolutely certain. From that point, the king was in charge of the Inquisition - and of all his churchmen. Under Espinosa, the Spanish Inquisition once again became a department of state. Under Philip and his son the Inquisition became the policeman of the nation's morals rather than the persecutor of Jews and their sympathisers (which had been its original justification).
