Passage B

Britain had recalculated its own strategic interests in the future status of Palestine. It was the site of important military operations, and government officials concluded that its value as a buffer to the Suez Canal had become too important to allow for an ill-defined international presence there after the war. These new interests developed in tandem with the efforts of the leading members of Britain's Jewish community who, in pursuit of the strategies of political Zionism, sought to persuade the government that Zionist interests complemented British interests. In addition, a complex combination of motives led to the final decision to issue the Balfour Declaration. Contemporary explanations tended to stress an interest in the restoration of the Jewish nation in Palestine based on their understanding of the Bible and also their sympathy for the plight of Jews in Eastern Europe. Officials came to see Zionism as an ally. British officials searched out Zionist support in pursuit of their own interests in Palestine. Their main aim was to keep the French out. Within a year of the Sykes-Picot Agreement, which called for the international administration of Palestine, Britain came round to fearing any foreign presence so close to the Suez Canal. Prejudices belied British support for Zionism. British officials drew upon a reserve of mistaken, even anti-Semitic, ideas and of a common Jewish nation, all of which tended to greatly exaggerate the power and influence of world Jewry.
