Source A is a poster of Mao and Stalin.

Source B

Adapted from a statement by US President Eisenhower on 8 October 1957.

President Eisenhower was responding to American public concern after the Soviet launch of the Earth's first man-made satellite, four days earlier.

The launch of the Soviet satellite is of considerable importance but it should not be exaggerated. Since 1945 the Soviet Union has prioritised the development of missiles and rockets. However, the United States has worked hard on all aspects of a space programme. We expect to launch a satellite within the year. The United States hopes that the Soviet Union will use satellites for peace and not for military purposes.

Source C

A Soviet poster with the title, 'Glory to the Soviet people'. It was published in 1963, the same year that a Soviet astronaut became the first woman in space.

Khrushchev would not name the head of the Soviet space programme, saying it was the Soviet people that deserved the credit.
