[25]Interpretation A

From 'Munich – Its Lessons Ten Years Later', an essay written by British historian Hugh Trevor-Roper, published in 1948.

There was plenty of evidence that Hitler was following a policy of aggression, but Neville Chamberlain was a man of limited intelligence. He simply could not believe that Hitler was any different from himself. If Chamberlain wanted peace, so must Hitler. If the evidence contradicted him, he ignored it. Chamberlain did not want to strengthen the alliance against Hitler, he wanted to break it up in order to clear the way for his personal diplomacy. The fact that he acted out of arrogance and stupidity, not out of wickedness, is no excuse. Hitler flattered Chamberlain by telling him he was the only man he had ever given in to, and Chamberlain believed him.

Interpretation B

From 'The Origins of the Cold War', an essay written by US historian Arthur Schlesinger, published in 1970.

Neither side made a decision to start the Cold War. It happened because each followed policies which the other saw as a threat. The USSR thought it had no choice but to strengthen its security in Eastern Europe. The Americans saw this as the USSR's first step towards taking over Europe and so they responded by declaring their interest in Eastern Europe. This made the USSR think that the USA was trying to set up anti-Soviet governments in the area. There was a failure of communication between the USA and the USSR and, as time went on, a tendency to think the worst of the other side's actions.

Soviet is another term for the USSR.
