Passage A

By 1960 the Nation of Islam (NOI) had become a national organisation with name recognition in every major black community. It was one of the fastest growing black organisations and posed a distinctive threat to the civil rights establishment. The NOI, primarily during Malcolm X's membership, provided a visible contrast to civil rights organisations. The demonisation of whites and the endorsement of self-defence was fundamentally incompatible with the humanistic language of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). On one level, the NOI brought attention to the presence of white supremacy virtually everywhere, and its effect on black people, such as unemployment, police brutality, and housing and job discrimination outside the South. It also made organisations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the SCLC seem attractive alternatives to white America, which recoiled at the bitter attacks made by the NOI. By 1963 concessions made from the white power structure were more common, partly because of the fear of the NOI, and the civil rights leadership knew this. The Black Power movement benefitted from the activities of the NOI. While the NOI did not adopt the slogans of Black Power, it promoted its essential principles: a rigorous affirmation of blackness and racial pride and an insistence on the economic and political liberation of black people, independent of whites.
